History conference attendance with help from the district to pay for it, once every couple of years would really help stay relevant in my discipline. Not all professional development can be done on campus.
Offering DE courses off campus
Suggestions for "Strategies for Oversized Classrooms": Perhaps the District should avoid using Instructional Equipment and Library Materials money (more than half a million dollars this year) to pay down the budget deficit. Instead, that money should be used for INSTRUCTIONAL PURPOSES. Like, that money could pay for quality tutoring services to offset this reality: with much larger classes, instructors are finding it more difficult to offer sufficient individual attention for all those students. And, some are suggesting that those new students coming in these days need more help with basic material/time management/motivation/you-name it. We need more good tutors!

Making videos of my lectures to post on BlackBoard. I put motivating students as number one. In keeping with that, classroom management strategies to reduce disruptive students, lateness, excessive bathroom breaks, better homework compliance, in short, guiding students to be more mature and serious.

A short introduction to the duties and expectations of adjunct faculty at the beginning of each term, by department chair or dean of the college.

perhaps something on "flipped" classrooms- just the basics such as what is it and how does it work especially for science classes

More trainings about SLOS

What is AB 1725 and the 10+1? I think some cultural enrichment would be good: concerts, poetry and creative writing readings, performances, art shows. Also: talks by successful people in various fields, not limited to education, including engineering, science, mathematics, languages, ambassadors and political figures, architects, designers, writers, journalists...

Textbooks cost a lot. Online homework cost a lot ($66-85/student/semester). I want to develop Blackboard homework.

Also, I want to do "something" to my PowerPoints on Blackboard so student wouldn't have to buy the textbook; but not upload them to BB. Is there an online tool like MS Publisher or Word that will allow documents converted into a something for students to read PP.

Having budgets for books, in addition to more training opportunities would be great. I'm always trying to find new books that might teach me something new that I can integrate into my personal knowledgebase, but these are all generally purchased directly by myself (I don't mind purchasing books that I want for myself...but to make these purchases for staff members, or to allow them the option of submitting something they'd like to get doesn't seem to be a common process)...it would be nice for managers to purchase sets of books for their staff that they might find useful in their day-to-day work (and would be less expensive than sending staff to offsite training).

Additionally, being able to set aside some time each week to teach each other as a team new techniques, or that can be used by individuals to build up new skills or work on special projects (think Google's 20% time...resulted in Gmail, 3M's 15% time resulted in the sticky note, etc.) is pretty essential on the IT side of things and can lead to additional innovations/improvements for the college
